By far the most widespread tale espoused by 9/11 conspiracy theorists - often referred to as "truthers" - is that the United States government either helped the attackers succeed, or orchestrated the entire thing themselves.

"Experts say part of the reason for the persistence of such conspiracy theories is the dissonance that results when people hear that a relatively small group of men using low-tech weapons caused such cataclysmic carnage," says the BBC.

Truthers claim the attacks were staged to justify the subsequent wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, a theory peddled by Andreas von Bulow, a former research minister in the German government.

Controlled demolition

The BBC reports that investigations in the wake of the attack "made it clear that the tower structures were weakened by the inferno from the planes and felled by the weight of collapsing floors".

However, it adds, "even now some people refuse to believe this version of events". A widely believed theory is that the towers were brought down in a controlled manner using demolition explosives.

The Daily Express points out that some truthers believe "the towers would not have collapsed in the way they did if they were hit by aircraft". In footage of the incident, the two main towers can be seen collapsing in on themselves floor by floor in a downward fashion with the debris landing over a relatively small footprint.

However, the National Institute of Standards and Technology (NIST) concluded that a "very large quantity" of explosives would have been required to bring down the buildings, in an operation that could not have been hidden from the public.
